An evaluation of the C-309T polymorphism of the thyrotropin receptor gene as a predictor of adverse outcome in asthma in children. Recent data suggest that the C-309T polymorphism of the thyrotropin receptor (TSH-R) gene has a role in the pathogenesis of Graves' disease and may also have a role in the pathogenesis of other autoimmune conditions. To determine whether this polymorphism influences the clinical course of asthma in children, we investigated 678 children with asthma for the presence of the C-309T polymorphism using the PCR-RFLP assay. We found that the TT genotype, compared with CC, was more frequent in children with severe asthma ($P = .001$). In a subgroup of patients with severe asthma who had been followed for up to 6 years, this association persisted ($P = .005$). In addition, in children with severe asthma, the TT genotype was more frequent among those who developed status asthmaticus ($P = .007$) and among those who were hospitalized for asthma exacerbation ($P = .02$). A significant association also existed for the CC genotype in children with severe asthma who had been followed for 3 years or more. In addition, this polymorphism was also associated with asthma exacerbation requiring systemic steroids ($P = .03$), which remained significant after adjustment for age, gender, and familial history of allergic disease ($P = .045$). These data suggest that the C-309T polymorphism of the TSH-R gene may be associated with increased severity of asthma and with the development of asthma-related complications in children.
